

An Indianapolis Divinity.

On Sunday, in the choir, with the stained-glass light about her,
Singing the old "Choir Gems," "The Palms," "The Better Land," so quaintly—
I wonder how the other angels get along without her—
She's so saintly!

On Monday, at the cooking class, measuring flour and butter—
Watching the clock with anxious eyes until the moment—best tick—
When her meringues are finished, she quite sets one's heart a flutter—
She's domestic.

On Tuesday comes her Browning Club, when she reads "Paracelsus,"
Making the mystic measures plain in manner most effectual;
Her glowing face, her plume, her classic brow—each tells us
She's intellectual.

On Wednesday could you see her with her short skirts swirling 'round her,
Swinging her clubs and dumb-bells after systems theoretical,
You might exclaim "The Queen of Health! Eureka! I have found her!"
She's athletic.

Thursday you meet her at a dance—her very eyes are dancing—
She's all in white and she coquettes and flirts till you are frantic—
You talk with her on tete-a-tete, and find her smile entrancing.
She's romantic.

At Friday's art-class (she can paint and sketch well, and—she knows it!)
You'll find her drawing from still-life, and—(there's a certain mystic
And very charming tone about her work that plainly shows it)
She's artistic.

But at the ball-game Saturday, the smartest beaux surround her—
Lorgnettes in hand, she praises plays of Quinn and Sullivan;
Chats, too, of "fies," "two-baggers," Scary's runs, or Berger's "grounders"—
She's a fan!

The Summer Exodus.

There has been a general exodus, East and West, from this city during the past week. Hundreds left Tuesday for New York. The station, large as it is, was jammed with people, and big boxes, little boxes, hand-boxes and bundles, lunchboxes in all sorts of receptacles, from bottles to boxes, umbrellas in all lengths and colors. Those who went were distinguished from those who went down to see them off by their garb. The great majority wore blue blazer suits, silk waists, sailor hats and blue veils. If they had been pupils from a school there could not have been a greater uniformity. She looked neat as a pin, pretty as a picture, and stylish. Those who were not out from this pattern were neither so neat, so pretty, nor so stylish. One young woman ventured to leave town who looked like a chorus girl from a comic opera. She did her very best to look well, but her taste, however acceptable it might be for the stage, was not exactly suited for travel over the great American continent. She had on a white sailor hat with red ribbons, long streamers, which swayed hither and yon in the breeze. Her dress was white cloth, or had been, at some time in the remote past. Its defects were overshadowed by a lot of red ribbon galluses. She made them herself. Anyone could have told that, even with poor eyesight. She had no buckles, so she made cute little bows. One ornamented each shoulder blade and consequently the front. Black mitts and rusted shoes. What she had in her bag could only be surmised from what she had on. The friend who was with her was going on the train, for they embraced affectionately, and said farewell a dozen times before the young woman finally went through the gates, and the vision of red, white, black and yellow passed from view. She evidently pitied the poor creatures who wore blue suits and no suspenders. She might not have secured the attention from the bystanders that she did, if she had been more soberly arrayed, but she certainly would have looked much better. There is no place like the station for studying people, and seeing characters.
